

Web Browsers

Since the dawn of the World Wide Web, developers have launched a staggering variety of web browsers to help users navigate the expanding digital frontier. Early pioneers defined the user experience, but the landscape shifted rapidly as competition intensified.

Consequently, the market has witnessed a continuous cycle where browsers emerge, peak, and eventually fade into the "software graveyard." In contrast to those that enjoyed a moment of glory, many ambitious startups failed to meet technical expectations or struggled to secure a loyal user base. Ultimately, this relentless evolution ensured that only the most adaptable software survived the ever-changing demands of the modern web.

All web browsers come with a logo. Can you identify a browser from its logo? From the many hundreds of browsers, below are some of the logos used. Can you put a name to them?
